FROM THE LITERATURE

Interpersonal Relationships

The Fall 1962 issue of the Harvard Education Review is devoted to guidance and counseling. One of the articles seems to have especial relevance for higher education. In "The Interpersonal Relationship: The Core of Guidance," Carl R. Rogers presents some hypotheses as to the characteristics of an effective helping relationship, whether it be teaching or counseling. The first he calls congruence by which he means that the counselor or teacher is completely and acceptingly himself, and that he does not shield this self from the client or student. The second demand is for empathy by which the helper can feel as if he were the person being helped. This genuine openness to the reactions of others is most difficult to achieve yet most significant if the helping relationship is to be a sound one. The third condition is for positive regard for the client or student with no conditions attached. (AHE Bulletin)

Changing Character of Colleges

Joseph R. Gusfield in "Intellectual Character and American Universities," The Journal of General Education, January 1963, uses the analytical methods of sociology to explain some of the current practice in higher education. He affirms that in Britain and in the American past the intellectual was a class-conscious and class-related person. Education was for gentlemen, and enough professors had independent means for them to serve as models of gentlemanly behavior. The professor himself was the product of upper-class related colleges and conveyed to student the language and values of class.

Gradually this pattern in America began to change, and an unattached intellectual emerged as the dominant form of professor. As colleges expanded their functions, as the number of institutions increased, and as colleges trained more in the professions, professors were recruited from a wider class base. Not being rooted in a class in the larger society, the intellectual formed a new class within the university which was alienated from other segments of society.

More recently still, as education has prepared for even more specialized vocations, there has come a still further fragmentization of the intellectual's culture. This has been brought about by the development of a highly skilled, bureaucratic individualism, increased national productivity, and increased development of professionalized occupations which have resulted also in the evolution of the mass university. In such an institution the faculty is unable to reach students as persons but merely trains them as experts; it adapts itself to the mass character of the institution and is unable to function as a culture-bearing group. Instead of serving as class models the faculty concentrates its attention on becoming more expert and training students to be more expert. The college professor sees himself more and more as a specialist in something rather than as a college professor. Colleges are currently operating to diminish the production of unattached intellectuals. (AHE Bulletin)

Are Academic Studies Autonomous?

One common purpose binds teacher and pupil together: both are concerned with the exploration of knowledge, whether this be the primary exploration of the researcher who stands on the real frontier of human knowledge, or the secondary activity of students who must personally explore and make their own, old and well-known ground. For the teacher in higher education, research (or further study) and teaching ought to be bound together in a fruitful and essential relationship; for one cannot long explore without desiring to communicate one's findings, and one cannot long teach without being driven back to further exploration.

The raison d'entre, then, of our "meetings" in the university is the pursuit of knowledge, and unless there is a real meeting of minds at a genuine intellectual level, we fail in our purpose. Whatever the valuable by-products may be in terms of personal or "pastoral" relationships, our main attention ought not to be concentrated on the fact of meeting, but on the common intellectual purpose which turns our eyes away from ourselves. And if the university is, indeed, under the sovereignty of God, we have to seek our Christian vocation there not in the spheres or activities that are peripheral, but in those that are central. To treat our academic work as purely technical, and regard our Christian service as done in asides, will not do: either we serve God in the very pursuit of knowledge itself, or our talk of Christian vocation in the university is hypocritical. (Majorie Reeves, "Three Questions In Higher Education" pp. 11-12)
