TRENDS IN ALCOHOL ADS

Similar to the reduction we have noticed in the pool of applicants to college, the number of individuals 20-35 years old is dwindling. As a beer in the country.

With fewer consumers, brewers have considered 3 alternatives to maintain their current income levels and pursue new markets for their products.

First, to raise the price of the product. Second, get beer drinkers to drink more on a per capita basis. Third, entice populations other than white males between 20-35 to increase their beer drinking.

While the 1st option will enable income to remain stable, it is only viable for those larger brewers who can withstand the decline in consumers that price hikes have historically created. To this end, it is expected that brewers will focus on the 2nd & 3rd options.

result, brewers are having to rethink advertising strategy since white males in this age group are the largest consumers of

Expect to see beer ads lure female patronage via spots that stray from the historical sexist view of women as 'mindless bimbos' whose job it is to serve the male beer drinker. The female will be portrayed as a full fledged consumer. Like the men, they will be portrayed as enjoying all the benefits of fun, social success and other glamorized images we have come to expect in beer ads.

While this may- at 1st glance- appear an improvement over the 'Swedish bikini team' images of women, it will be tragic if economically motivated moves away from sexist ads result in increased numbers of women pursuing the beer oriented myths brewers have taught men to expect of drinking.

JUNIORS/SENIORS DRINK LESS

Preliminary results of research on collegiate drinking conducted at La Salle suggests that 3rd & 4th year students tend to drink less frequently than their 1st & 2nd year counterparts. Among reasons given: reduction of culture shock realized in transition from high school, boredom with the 'drink to get drunk' mentality of the college neophyte, exposure to non-alcohol or moderate use alternatives to socializing.

INFORMATION & REFERRAL

As you interact with students- in or out of class, in conversation or written assignment- should s/he make any of the following comments, consider it a cry for help and support their looking into a possible problem with alcohol:

Help!

1. talking about trying to cut down. Social drinkers do not wonder if drinking is a problem,
2. express annoyance at others criticizing their drinking. Where there's smoke there's fire,
3. expressing feelings of guilt or shame related to drinking or drinking related behavior. What causes a problem is itself a problem as it creates a problem,
4. taking an 'eye-opener' or drink upon waking. This is often a sign of using alcohol to ward off the symptoms of withdrawal.

For the individual who says yes to 1 of these items, there is a 2/3 chance drinking has become a problem. Yes to 2 or more, 90% chance.

Often an understanding suggestion from a respected individual will result in the drinker seeking help.

LOOPHOLE CREATED IN PA LAW

The Pennsylvania Supreme Court has created a large loophole in the state's underage alcohol possession/drinking law. A recent court decision has now made it incumbent upon the arresting officer to 'prove' the substance in the beer or liquor bottle actually contains alcohol.

Analyzing the substance and documenting its alcohol content is now a prerequisite of implementing the PA. law.

While legislators have vowed to close this loophole immediately upon returning to session, it has been suggested that in the meantime police use the breathalyzer in order to detect the alcohol in the consumer in lieu of in the container!

DRINKING & DRIVING VIDEO

A new video produced by State Farm Insurance takes a factual yet non-judgmental look at the problem of drinking and driving. Using an actual case involving a male college student and his family & friends, the events leading up to a drinking related traffic fatality and its aftermath are reviewed in this 15 minute video.

The AOD Program has developed a discussion outline to accompany this video and it is available- with or without a discussion leader- for use in class; call X-1355.
